African Politics (4-vol. set)

Series: Critical Concepts in Political Science

Scholars and students of African politics address some of the thorniest issues of our time. Indeed, over the last thirty years or so, the subdiscipline has expanded in scope and ambition, and leads the way in major fields of research, such as the study of ethnicity and identity politics.

Now, this timely new collection from Routledge, edited by Nic Cheeseman (the former Director of the African Studies Centre at Oxford University), brings together the classic and essential texts of African politics, creating a top-quality and easily accessible resource for students, researchers, and policymakers alike. The four volumes that make up the collection are structured around the biggest questions that have dominated African Studies:

- * What was the legacy of colonial rule, and has Africa broken free of its international dependency?
- * How are ethnic identities formed, and what impact have they had?
- * Why is Africa so poor? What are the main barriers to development?
- * Is democracy feasible in Africa, and, if so, how can it be designed to promote political stability?

Each volume is introduced by a comprehensive summary chapter, newly written by the editor, which both provides a valuable overview of the key trends in the literature and explains what we know, what we don't know, and what controversies remain.

African Politics: Critical and Primary Sources is an indispensable reference collection focusing on the most important contributions in the field of African politics. Bringing together high-quality essays drawn from over half a century of journal articles, book chapters, and historical documents, supported by introductory essays, this reference work provides the essential foundation for scholars and students to engage with the field of African politics and a core reference for the launching of their own research. The four-volume collection covers a wide set of perspectives, problematics, and approaches within the field of African politics. The collection covers essential (English language and translated) works generated by scholars and practitioners from Africa, Europe, and North America. Reflecting an eclectic understanding of the sources that have contributed to the development of African politics as a field of study, the essays are drawn from a wide range of disciplines, including Anthropology, Economics, Sociology, and Religious Studies. Likewise, the essays reflect the broad ideological, philosophical, and theoretical streams that have informed scholarship on African politics.

Editors & Contributors

John Stone is Professor of Sociology at Boston University. Born in London and educated at the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford, his research interests in the field of race relations started with a chance visit to apartheid South Africa in the 1960s. This developed into a lifelong career researching race, ethnicity and nationalism around the world. He was the Founding Editor of Ethnic and Racial Studies and has written numerous books and articles on the subject including Racial Conflict in Global Society (Polity, 2014), which he co-authored with Polly S. Rizova.

Dennis M. Rutledge is Professor of Sociology and Anthropology at George Mason University. A Recipient of The Joseph S. Himes Lifetime Achievement Award from the Association of Black Sociologists and The Du Bois-Johnson-Frazier Award from The American Sociological Association, he is the author, co-author, editor and co-editor of thirteen books, including Race and Ethnicity: Comparative Theoretical Approaches (Wiley, 2003) with John Stone. He is a past President of the Association of Black Sociologists and formerly Editor of Elsevier's Series on Research in Race and Ethnic Relations.

Anthony D. Smith is Professor Emeritus of Nationalism and Ethnicity at the London School of Economics, Honorary President of the Association for the Study of Ethnicity and Nationalism, and the Founding Editor of the journal Nations and Nationalism. Among his many books in this field are The Ethnic Origins of Nations (Wiley, 1987); Nations and Nationalism in a Global Era (Polity, 1995); Ethnosymbolism and Nationalism (Routledge, 2009) and The Nation made Real (Oxford 2013).

Polly S. Rizova is Associate Professor of Management at Willamette University's Atkinson GSM. Her research interests are in the areas of management of technological innovation, the effect of social networks on group and organizational performance, and in the study of Race and Ethnic relations and organizational diversity. She is the author of The Secret of Success: The Double Helix of Formal and Informal Structures in a R&D Laboratory (Stanford UP, 2007) and co-author of Racial Conflict in Global Society (Polity, 2014) with John Stone.

Xiaoshuo Hou is Associate Professor of Sociology and Asian Studies and the Frances Young Tang '61 Chair in Chinese Studies at Skidmore College. Her publications include Community Capitalism in China: The State, the Market, and Collectivism (2013) and numerous articles on the economic and social transformation of contemporary Chinese society. She was also the Managing Editor on this project.

From Introduction

The overall aim of the Encyclopedia is to provide authoritative entries concerning three of the most explosive issues of our age. They are written by hundreds of scholars, most of whom have spent decades studying particular issues in the field. There are also rising stars from many disciplines who are making substantial contributions to understanding these most perplexing sources of social conflict and finding methods for their resolution. Above all, we have tried to draw on expertise from a wide panel of scholars living and working all over the world to provide a diversity of views and perspectives on what are often highly contested and controversial problems. The five main editors have a variety of specializations and fields of interest that have helped us to include a series of topics that break out of the conventional selection found in previous works of this kind. Given our global outlook, we have also consciously tried to avoid an arrow disciplinary approach to these complex and dynamic issues, intentionally using a mixture of academic traditions—sociology, history, political science, international relations, psychology, philosophy, anthropology, and literature together with more applied fields confronting race, ethnic, and national relations — that offer the most in terms of providing insight and understanding about these central challenges confronting modern society. In many respects we have used the same model that has been developed so successfully since the late 1970s by the journal Ethnic and Racial Studies, of which one of the editors was a founding editor. Specifically, we have aimed to keep the Encyclopedia “paradigm neutral,” not only to boost the interdisciplinary nature of the work but also to avoid the temptation to adopt an arrow focus precluding the full range of possible explanatory variables and alternative interpretations. Thus the reader will find contributions emphasizing a number of influential perspectives, including, for example, such diverse analyses as those based on rational choice, neo-Marxism, sociobiology, or postmodernism. It is our contention that all of these approaches have made a distinctive contribution to the debates in the three topic areas, and to exclude some at the expense of others would not have been an appropriate strategy for this enterprise. Suffice to say, we are not pursuing a policy of bland eclecticism and we are pleased with the consistently high quality of the entries no matter what core assumptions the writers may be making. Our model, being akin to that of Ethnic and Racial Studies, has a strong social science base but has remained open to further contributions from demographers, statisticians, social workers, and conflict-resolution specialists, to mention just a few examples. We have made a particular effort to include topics that are rarely given much prominence in general works covering race, ethnicity, and nationalism. The link between diversity and the strategies of management and businesses in the global economy is one such field. While there is a considerable literature on ethnic entrepreneurship and middle men minorities, the impact of racial, ethnic, and national factors on global institutions is one growing area that raises increasingly important questions—questions that our contributors have attempted to address in several of the entries. Another distinct feature of the Encyclopedia has been to include sufficient weight to the societies of East and South Asia, where growing economic and political influence has changed traditional power relations and created many tensions between groups that have had an impact not only within and between particular states but also as a result of extensive population movements, diasporas, and global repercussions emanating from the enhanced salience of these many states in the new political order. All of the editors have worked in “global universities” with colleagues and students drawn from all five continents. We have been assisted by a range of editorial advisers who are likewise diverse in their backgrounds and locations, and, while some are clustered in North America and Europe, their origins and early experiences have been shaped from these other regions of the world. We have sought to exploit these networks to achieve a balance between traditional approaches to scholarship in race, ethnicity, and nationalism, and the interesting contrasts that emerge when these topics are viewed from other perspectives and seen from alternative worldviews. While no encyclopedia can cover all topics from every possible political and cultural tradition, we hope that the entries collected here will engage the contemporary reader—whether scholar, student, or general member of the public—searching for authoritative answers to some of the most pressing questions facing contemporary society.
